The cebin of the "Simple Susan," as Capt. Picklin knew, was engaged on her next passage to Constantinople by a party of Missionaries, male and fomale, and the request was to the intent that, in case of an activate of the Constantinople of the Co was to the intent may, in case of an ac-ceptance of his offer, the fair daughter of the owner would come out under their sufficient protection, to be wedded, if she should so please, on the day of her ar-rival in the "Golden Horn."

'As Miss Picklin had preserved a mys terious silence on the subject of "Mi terious silence on the shipect of "Mr. Kenis" attentions since his departure, and, as a lady with twenty thousand dol-lars in her own right ir, of course, quite independent of paternal control, the cap-tain, after running his eye hastily through the document, called to the boy who was weighing out a quintal of coddish, and bid him wreys the letter in a brown paper and run with it to Miss Picklin—aking it for granted that she knew more about the matter than he did, and would ex-bain it all, when he, came home to din.

And there ended the captain's doubts, for he never again got eight of the letter, and the turmoil of preparation for Mess. Picklit's voyage, made the house anything but a place for getting answers to imperiment questions. Themie, whom the neves had made sillent and thoughful, let drop a hint or two that she would like to see the letter, but a mysterious air, and "lat! child, you wouldn't understand it," was check enough for her tindi curiosity, and she plied her needle upon her sister's wedding dress with patient submission.

The preparations for one voyage went on a winningly. The missionsires were written to, and willingly consented to chaptron Miss Picklin over the seas, provided by a Christian ceremonial. Miss Picklin replies with virtuous prompitude that the cake for the wedding was already soldered up in a tin case, and that she was to be married immediately and the cally in the cally in the case of the wedding was the was to be married immediately and the cally in the selection of the representation of the cally in the selection of the selectio
