STORY OF A POLICEMAN.

It was virtually, though not formally, left the force when a young man, of gentlemanly but somewhat dissipated aspect...

know, I had large experience in such matters. That also, I suspect, is Mr. Hutton's opinion; and hence not only his refusal to prosecute, but the expense and trouble he has been at, to my knowledge...

several pressing debts of honor, as they are called—debts of honor, which, according to my experience, be the apter phrase—which it was absolutely necessary to discharge; and the success, moreover, of my matrimonial project entirely depended upon my ability to secure a very considerable sum of money.

my zeal and disregard, I returned home to find my father struck down, in what was at first thought would prove mortal illness; by the eldest—Captain Bramston's doors shut against me—would the untimely marriage of my sister, Jane, with an amiable young man, peremptorily broken off by his relatives, on account of his want of money.

the dining-room. 'Have the kindness,' I said, 'to let me see the hat Brown left behind at the tavern in exchange for yours.' The young man seemed surprised at the apparent oddness of the request, but immediately complied with it.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1852.

We publish today, to the almost entire exclusion of editorial, and a large amount of other matter, the noble address of Messrs. Seward, Chase, and others, to the people of Ohio, on the Nebraska bill...

It is not, however, to be supposed that our readers are to be left in a casual perusal of the bare-fact, unadorned attempt of that traitor of the south, Douglas, to open Nebraska to slavery, demands something more than a passing notice from true friends of free institutions, especially when the gigantic wrong has a vengeful press, and hosts of paid politicians to support it.

But a day of retribution is at hand, and we to those tritulators when it does come. Their glaring inconsistencies have opened the eyes of the people, and they begin to see the difference between party and principle.

Buying Manure.
It has been decided at the proper depth of turning manure. Some hold that it sinks in the soil, is washed downward by the leaching rains, and should therefore be applied near the surface. Others assert that its volatile and most valuable parts rise by fermentation, and that consequently it should be buried deep. Now it is proper to say that when the manure is fresh, and both are equally wrong; but in the present instance, and hence the reason that pulverization or harrowing before manure is turned under gives a result in large crops.

The power which may be used in absorbing the fertilizing portion of manure, is very great. Soil which possesses a medium amount of clay, or loam, with a medium degree of retentiveness, will retain the valuable in ordinary yard manure, equal to nearly the same bulk. For loads of manure to the acre, form a heavy coating of soil, and in the case of the square rods, requiring a depth, which is spread of only one third of an inch. Consequently, it is a coating of fertile soil, and in the case of the square rods, requiring a depth, which is spread of only one third of an inch. Consequently, it is a coating of fertile soil, and in the case of the square rods, requiring a depth, which is spread of only one third of an inch.

There are many proofs of the correctness of the position here taken. We have made large piles of compost, consisting of one-third rich soil, one-third of manure, and one-third of straw, and the odor was completely retained, and not the least portion passed off into the atmosphere. We have had large dead animals, with a coating of only six inches of loam, not the faintest odor reaching the surface. On the other hand, the soil which forms the bottom of manure yards, is not found even within a few inches of the surface, to be as rich as the soil which is piled on top of it.
