THE OLD SCHOOL HOUSE.

Hard by the broad and dusty street,
There maples throw a cooling shade,
And frequent tread of playful feet,
A bare and beaten way was made;
The behool house standeth, old and rude,
And there a score of years hath stood.

And there's score of years man stood.

The windows curtainless and bare,
Are marred with many a broken pane,
Until the shrill autumnal air,
Or wintry blast, beat through again;
And the rude benches and the walls
Are rough with uncouth cuts and scrawls.

The rill that babbles sparkling by, Has not a free unbroken flow;

And infant navies o'er it go;
And where it slumbers still and wide,
The boys in winter skate and slide.

And passing by the half-ope'd door,

You hear the teacher, loud and clear,
Pouring his precepts evermore

Into the young and listless car.
Patience and hope his toils attend,
And to his heart their sunshine lend.

And to mis near therewishing teach.

A plain, contented man is he,

He burns no incense mean to fame;

Tis bis alike unmoved to be,

'Midst kindling fistery or blame;

A busbandman in mind's rich soll,

He deems it prou

He loves to gaze on coming years, And watch those buoyant spirits se buoyant spirits climbatures of his cares and fe High up the fame-paved mount of Time, And thinks right hopefully to share Their triumphs and their honors there.

Their triumpas and their honors there.

Now at the golden wane of day,

O'erjoyed to hall their labors o'er,

The little legions wild for play,

Burst forth with frolle and approar,

While down their mitrib's Lotabrian tide,

All thoughts of books and lessous glide.

Dearer than all certh's kingly halls
