Red Smith's Plymouth Wins Fifth Game, 44-0

NEW YORK - On a gray, raw day in the final week of the baseball season, with Brooklyn, Milwaukee and Cincinnati clamoring down the home stretch in one of the most exciting pennant races ever, the Dodgers drew 7,000-odd customers to an enormously important game in Ebbets Field.

Wherever baseball man gathered evice of claim Beaten By

Wherever baseball men gathered, cries of alarm were heard. "A race like this and only 7,000 people?" were heard. "A race like this and only 7,000 people?" Danville

To ears that have been tuned in since the pre-depression twenties, the cries have a so familiar ring. Since the beginning of memory, deep thinkers have sought explanations the Mansfield area, throtfor the decline in baseball's popularity. First it was the mass record the Leroy, 44-0, for its fifth production of automobiles, carrying the public off to the country on holidays; then radio; then the increasing popularity of participant sports like golf; then the movement of straight defeat as Danville urban populations to suburbia and annualization to protected a perfect record urban populations to suburbia and exurbia; then decrepit protected a perfect record parks and lack of parking space; then television; and, of The only mark course, there's always been weather.

Strangled by all these influences, baseball's got to die, ness touched no all-time peak mustn't it? So in 1956, with in 1956.
